THE MONTICOLA

ENGRAVED, COMPILED AND PUBLISHED

BY
WILL L. MCKAY
NEW YORK

PRESIDENT PURINTON

Governor Albert B. White

ALBERT B. WHITE is a college-bred man, having taken the degree of A. B. in the classical course at Marietta College, class of 1878, being valedictorian of his class, which numbered twenty-two at graduation. He has since taken the degree of A. M. in cursu.

From July, 1878, to July, 1899, he was engaged in the newspaper business. He purchased the Daily State Journal at Parkersburg, early in 1881, and was editor of that paper, establishing the daily issue of it in 1883, until he disposed of his newspaper interests in July, 1899.

He was President of the National Editorial Association of the United States in 1888.

He served two terms as United States Collector of Internal Revenue for the District of West Virginia—the first term under President Harrison's administration and the second term under McKinley's first administration, resigning the position upon being elected Governor.

He was elected Governor in 1900 by a majority approximating 20,000, and was inaugurated March 4, 1901.

Governor White is specially interested in educational matters, his father being one of the leading educators of the country, and has shown himself to be a warm friend of the University as well as of our other State educational institutions.

He was born September 22, 1856.

Hon. Henry G. Davis

HON. HENRY G. DAVIS, Chairman of the United States delegation to the Pan-American Conference, was born in Maryland. His early life was spent on a farm. When, in early manhood, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was built through the farm on which he lived, he was employed by that company, and thus became interested in railroading, to which most of his life has been devoted. He is now president of the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg, the Piedmont and Cumberland, the Coal and Iron railway companies, and also of the Davis Coal and Coke Company, one of the leading bituminous coal corporations of the United States. For many years he has been one of the leading spirits in the development of West Virginia, and a number of towns have been founded by him, the largest of which, Davis, is a community of some three thousand people. His political career began when he was elected a delegate to the West Virginia State Legislature. He was twice elected to the State Senate, and on the occasion of his first election to that body every vote except one, in the town of Piedmont, in which he then lived, was cast for him. From the State Senate he went to the United States Senate, serving there twelve years, when he declined re-election in order to give all of his attention to the development of the natural resources of his State. While in the United States Senate, he was a prominent member of the Appropriations Committee, and for some time its chairman. He is now president of the Davis National Bank and the West Virginia Trust Company, and a director in several other financial institutions. Although deeply engrossed in business affairs, he has from time to time been called upon to give his counsel in matters of public interest, and is now a member of the commission recently appointed to revise the taxation and corporation laws of West Virginia. Mr. Davis has always taken a deep interest in the improvement of the political and commercial relations of the American republics. He served as a delegate to the first Pan-American Congress, held in Washington in 1889, and was a member of the International Railway Commission which supervised the surveys for the proposed road to connect the railway systems of the United States and Mexico with those of Argentina.

History of the Class

All the great deeds of men have been successfully accomplished by first having a small beginning and then a gradual developing and working to the final success. Such a state of affairs is continually taking place around us; little things are terminating in great issues. The truth of this statement can nowhere find greater proof than by comparing the Freshmen Class of 1900 with the Junior Class of 1902.

In the fall of '99 a number of eager and hopeful students entered the college walls of the West Virginia University. This body of people was composed of distinguished graduates of West Virginia's High Schools and Seminaries. While a few had just passed through the trials and tortures of Prepdom in the University, fear and awe for their respective seniors in college work kept their eloquence, ability and power lying latent, instead of being active and progressive. The Monticola Board of that year announced to the public that the Freshmen Class was too young for a history, and not sufficiently logical for an organization. Ah, how manners and times have changed! The post-graduate visiting his Alma Mater today asks if it can be possible that these active, wide-awake and energetic Juniors are the same ones who composed the obscure and almost forgotten Freshmen Class of 1900. As a great calm always precedes an outburst of tempest and storm, so the silence of this one year paved the way for far grander achievements than had been accomplished by preceding classes.

After all examinations were over, and the feet were firmly placed on the second rung of the college ladder, a new impulse and ambition was given to all. A desire to be known became manifest. Accordingly a class organization was effected, and one of the most brilliant and energetic members chosen as president. Learning now made rapid progress. Poetry thrived admirably under the new environment. Songsters made their first appearance and gave promise of a magnificent and glorious future success.

The evening of November 26, 1901, was cold and frosty when the Juniors assembled for organization. A score of efficient and willing officers were elected. The interest of the class was taken to heart. All were eager and anxious to do and dare. The efforts put forth have not been in vain, as many of the Juniors have already made themselves famous in the institution.

The societies have been wonderfully helped with the literary ability possessed by members of this class. On the athletic field the Juniors are worthy of special notice. Honors and renown have been won on all sides. Orators are winning glory for themselves and their class. Debaters gain the decision in contests. All are learning and daily receiving lessons, which will help them to become better men and women and will enable them to do more for God and man.

If the historian possessed sufficient power, she would uncover the misty veil of the future and present each individual as he will appear in his particular walk of life.

Orators, statesmen, preachers and lawyers rise in hopeless confusion. Each one is distinguished in his particular profession and is winning laurels from all men.

The girls appear no less distinguished, although their abilities are shown in different lines. Some of their names shine with that of Susan B. Anthony as stars in the galaxy of those who have given their lives that woman may have equal rights with her brother; others, in the humbler though no less honorable walks of life, live dispensing charity, and trying to raise the poor and lowly to a higher and nobler life.

But let the station in life be what it will, may each member of the class be a whole-hearted, true-souled man and woman, and ever do his best to make the world better for having lived in it.

"This above all, to thine ownself be true,
And it must follow as night, the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

—"HISTORIAN."

History of Senior Law Class

The traditions of law class histories dictate that all such matters shall be formal, learned and apologetic. Introduced by an exposition on the dignity of the law, developed by the narration of petitions, riots, mobs and "order"; concluded with a prophecy of fame and justice. Filled with wit and erudition. Petitioning the God of forgiveness for a new trial, and justifying all wrongs by putting the blame on another class.

The Law Class, commonly known as "The Animals," have preceded us. "The Barbarians" of 1900 have gone from the marked halls. "The Aggregation of Freaks," the Juniors, follow in our footsteps, one year behind. We have either failed to merit, or defied, description. Whether our platform is order or chaos; whether we stand for law or anarchy, no one has been able to guess. It is not unlikely that we all are of all types and possessed of all purposes within a single day; yes, moved in our feelings from tears of pity to rejoicings in hellishness. So whether we seriously study now, and in another moment innocently throw missiles in Judge's room, "assassinating" some fellow; or whether we go religiously and prayerfully to church four times on Sunday and come down street Monday morning singing "Hail! Hail! the gang's all here, what in the Hell do we care?" we are the "Senior Laws"—that's all; no other or more careful description will add anything to the comprehension of the hundreds who see and hear! us every day.

Moreover, the students of the university are universally glad that we are here. For the law student can sit face to face with his teacher, upset the chair of his fellow-student and declare that the poor fellow's head was broken on the floor by his own wrongful, wilful and voluntary act. So the law student cheerfully bears the blame of every act of misconduct, even of Prep. and Cop. He thinks it is a part of his life. That is what he is here for, to relieve guilty humanity. Nor does condemnation take from his aggressiveness.

The events that have occupied no small part of our attention are worth chronicling, too. For our fellow students they are "Sport that wrinkled Care derides."

Roseinbloom buys a two-headed calf and becomes Morgantown's popular menagerie keeper. Pope Theodoroff (who used to sell pictures) sees a business opportunity and negotiates with "Rosey" for "the exclusive right to publish and sell" his picture. "Rosey" demands that Theodoroff withdraw negotiation under penalty of the fist, and the picture man, being "bulldozed," again makes the menagerie keeper an offer—to get a bullet and fight him Pope retires from the class saying: "Excuse me, Professor, I'll go get a gun." (Seeks legal advice.)

Jokes depend on the atmosphere. Now Dr. Brooke never admits of jokes. "Well, Sah, Mr. X—, I see no occasion for merriment, Sah. The windows are all closed tight, Sah, and the air currents cut off, Sah, and it is already so stuffy here, Sah, that I expect, Sah, no one will find occasion for doing more than absorb the lecture, Sah." Nor indeed does he. It is with great effort that the lecture is imbedded in the mind of the student after it passes through the hot, dense air of the room, even when Doctor pauses to give what he has said "time to lodge."

The events of the class room of the Dean have not the wondrous perspective of time that would diminish the prominence of unrighteous conduct and suffer minor details to melt into the haze of the receding landscape. We would refrain from narrating how "the only class that can be trusted" (on examination day!!) is said to "Chip, chip, chip the plaster"; how chairs turn over and their occupants are carried out; how marbles, rocks, clods, clubs and pennies are thrown; how sulphuretted hydrogen makes the very walls of the room offensive; how all manner of conduct passes by without indictment, trial and conviction. And the Dean is convinced that what he saw Mr. A. do was the misconduct of Mr. B.—and thus he is compelled to disbelieve his own senses, so stoutly does the apprentice at law argue.

"In law, what plea so tainted and corrupt,
But, being seasoned with a gracious voice,
Obscures the show of evil?"

But after the days of work and pleasure have ended here in college, life calls to other fields. The classic halls come to be objects of dearest memory, and the activities of life absorb alike the reckless and the sincere. With life, duties and responsibilities grow. Parents, community, State and nation claim something from our lives. So the recklessness of college days is put aside; strength and dignity, manliness and honor mark the lawyer among his fellowmen. He lives to his God, his country, his duty.

"Mastering the lawless science of our law—
That codeless myriad of precedent,
That wilderness of single instances,
Through which a few, by wit or fortune led,
May beat a pathway out to wealth and fame."

HISTORIAN.

History of Junior Law Class

It was the 16th of September that about fifty students matriculated with one of the several members of the law faculty as their class officer. Those men met at 8:30 the following morning to listen to their first lecture in Blackstone. That hour has become sacred to the memory of those young men, as the time when they entered upon their life's work and took upon themselves the profession of law, the noblest profession in all the world, "that of righting humane wrongs." Those men constituted the Junior Law Class of nineteen hundred and three. Men from every part of the Mountain State, from Virginia, Pennsylvania and Texas joined in making the class of '03 one of the most brilliant classes of that department.

In the ranks of the Junior Law are poets, soldiers, farmers, authors, artists, senators, legislators and even a member of the Board of Regents of our University, all of whom have the brightest of prospects. They may not all become beacon lights in their profession, but those who lack the brilliancy of mind characteristic of some have that dogged perseverance and determination which will bring them success.

Although the class has been rent at times by fights between its members as to who should hold offices, it is not weakened like the Greek and Spartan states of old, but remained a strong, sturdy and united class when a common enemy arose.

We have said that there has been some trouble between members of the class, but it was only such wrangling as occurs when there is a real old-fashioned blood and thunder class election.

There was an election held during the first term and a president was elected without a dissenting vote; but, unfortunately, the president thus chosen was forced to lay down his sceptre on leaving school at the end of that term, and another election was precipitated. It was during the winter term that the second election was held, and "Time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary" has recorded none like it.

So much excellent material could be had to fill the position that it took all of an afternoon to determine who was president.

The year is nearly gone and the class has made a strenuous effort to master Blackstone under the guidance of our most learned instructor, Dr. Brooke. Difficulties that have arisen in contracts and bailments have, by the ever ready hand of Professor Willey, been wiped away. The obstacles which have loomed up before us in our study of criminal law have been surmounted with ease under the masterly direction of Judge Johnson.

The class behavior has at times been assailed by students of other departments, but those who know the class will testify to the fact that a more decorous class never entered a lecture room.

Explanatory

The Alfred Guild is a direct outgrowth of the increased interest in Anglo-Saxon language and history among the English speaking peoples.

The Shield, the Sword, and the Pen of King Alfred have played no small part in directing and shaping the affairs of the world. The name and fame of Alfred come down bright and clear to us through the sunshine and shadows of a thousand years. We do homage at his shrine.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF THE WEST VIRGINIA UNIVERSITY has during the two years of its existence arisen from a shadowy uncertainty to a firm reality. The former enrollment of fifteen has increased to fifty. The various departments of the Association are carrying out their special line of work in an efficient and profitable manner. The spiritual work has received the most careful thought and prayer. The development of active Christian character among the members is earnestly sought for.

With a welcoming smile, the members of the Association are constantly seeking to extend a helping hand to the girls who, having left the protecting care of the parental home, are cast among strangers in the city of Morgantown.

The Association extends an earnest appeal for all Christian girls to give their assistance in promoting the cause of Christ. On the other hand, it earnestly desires those who are not Christians to come and be helped by the influence of Christian fellowship.

Football Songs

Once again we're on the turf, and ready for the fray,
Once more we've come to show the farmers how to play,
Once again we've formed our lines, we're bound to win
the day,

While we go marching to victory,

CHORUS.

Hoora, Hoora, for W. V. U.,
Hoora, Hoora, for the old gold and blue,
Never late but up-to-date, we'll push the pigskin
through,
While we go marching to victory.

If you think we're half asleep or altogether tame,
That is where we'll fool you for we'll get there just the same,
Every man is wideawake and always in the game,
While we go marching to victory.

CHORUS.

Like tigers in the sheep-fold, like lions in the fray,
We'll meet them on the football field and take the game away;

Marietta's scalp will hang at our captain's belt to-day,
While we go marching to victory.

CHORUS.

There steady boys, along the line, don't let the farmers
through,
We'll break their tackles, run their ends and buck the center, too,
We'll show the royal muscle of the old gold and blue,
While we go marching to victory.

CHORUS.

Shove 'em Along

Air: "Three Black Crows."
Just shove 'em along a yard or two,
For W. V. U.
Just shove 'em along a yard or two,
For W. V. U.
Just shove 'em along a yard or two,
We'll tell you when to stop.
Yell like hell boys,
Virginia's on top.

A Love Story

They were both very young and very foolish. If they had been older they would have been more dignified, no doubt, and would have employed those proper and polite forms of courtship with which veteran lovers delight to torture each other. But unfortunately they knew no more about lovemaking than the birds that mate in the spring time:—that is why I have this story to record.

Roger was the offspring of good old English ancestors—I suppose that is the proper way to say it. Everything that smacks of aristocracy must be spoken of with some enthusiasm. He was gay, petted, allowed to do anything he wished except mingle with his vulgar neighbors. He must not go out alone for fear that he might not be able to select companions who were his equals in birth and social standing. Consequently he was lonely, dissatisfied, and victim marked for the blind boys' aim.

With Roger in this state of mind, a new family moved into the house next door. The event was hardly noticed by Roger's family, who, being aristocratic, entertained a lordly indifference for their immediate neighbors; but Roger had not yet grown into this family virtue. He was curious to know what his neighbors were like; so it was not long until he was reconnoitering the newcomers from the back-yard fence. And that is how he first saw her.

Kittie, for this happened to be her name, was a pretty, plump, romping little thing, with gentle voice and kitten-like ways, innocent and thoughtless, just like the sort of creature that is most bewitching to the opposite sex. She could not have been more appropriately named. Roger had never seen anything so charming; he suddenly felt extremely lonesome in his back-yard.

Pass over the strolls that Roger took to and fro, along the garden fence; they afforded little satisfaction to him and would hardly interest you. One day in looking out of my window, which overlooked Kittie's garden from the other side—and by the way I had, somehow, contracted the habit of looking out of that window—I saw Roger on the wrong side of the fence. I don't know how he came to make such a mistake, but there he was. And there was Kittie also, apparently not a bit offended at his impudence; indeed they seemed already to be the best of friends. Youthful, innocent, hearts never see the social barriers between them. They just flow into one another as naturally and as thoughtlessly as brooklets.

This was not the only time that Roger visited his neighbor's back-yard. It grew to be a habit with him; and Kittie seemed actually to encourage him and was always waiting for him. Those delightful afternoons in May seemed to have been designed just for these two. They had contracted an alarming attachment for each other—youthful loves are sometimes called by the undignified and vulgar name of "puppy-love." I suppose this was a case of "puppy-love."

Now, I don't know what excuse Roger could have given for this continuous trespassing on his neighbor's territory, or whether he had any excuse. At any rate, he might have known that this back-yard courting would bring trouble; but I have already said, he was young and foolish.

You will notice that Roger carried on his courtship in the afternoon. This was the only time available for the purpose. In the evening he would have been missed from the family circle and the cause of his absence investigated; but in the afternoon, as I have found out from stories on this subject, each one amuses himself as best he can. It was Roger's opportunity. Kittie's flirtations, however, were not confined to the afternoon. Perhaps this is rather a harsh accusation. It does seem almost sacrilegious to even suspect duplicity in one apparently so artless; but who knows? The ways of the sex are past finding out. All I know is, that, in the evening, when Roger was sleeping the sleep of the just, there have risen to my ears from that back-yard accents of a masculine voice that was not Roger's.

Still worse, Roger's conduct came to the ears of his family: they were scandalized. If he had been caught walking in thievish ways, they would not have considered it a greater disgrace. If he wished to go calling the best parlors of the city were open to him. Why then did he not proceed like a Christian, instead of prowling around other people's back-yards? Then, too, very likely Miss Kittie was low born and no fit companion for him. The circumstances demand severe discipline and as a foretaste of the punishment to follow, the young culprit spent the rest of the day behind a locked door.

When one is gentle, one's family takes such an absurd interest in one's affairs! Roger found it so. He was so carefully watched that he could get no chance to see Kittie. How lonesome she must be now! One day he just went out to the fence. He was at once called back and reprimanded.

And that evening—why did he not go quietly to bed as usual? But no, that was too tame a procedure for his present state of mind. He was restless and ill-tempered and finally stealing away from the sitting-room made his way to the back porch.

Nature was doing her utmost to bring forth a perfect night. The pure, pale, moonlight lay upon the earth like a vestal garment, and softly through the leaves whispered the breath of the summer night. It was a scene to soothe every human passion. I do not say that it soothed Roger: he was too angry to notice it. In a short time he left the house and walked out into the garden.

It was not long until, either on account of his abstraction or from force of habit, he was in his neighbor's back-yard. Now, he should have remained at home. Any one, who is used to it may roam about at night without hazard, but when a novice goes out something is sure to happen. Everybody knows this, but poor, unsuspecting Roger, once in his old haunts, as if by magic, his abstraction left him. Every nook, upon which his eye rested, was associated with some pleasant recollection of Kittie. Under this lilac bush they had lingered so often at parting that he could hardly realize that he now stood there alone. Moved by an indescribable longing, he sauntered up toward the house; and there on the steps sat Kittie. He sprang forward eagerly, but at once checked himself and stood in amazement. There by her side sat another. It is the old story over again. The one before him looked enough like her to be her brother, but unfortunately Roger did not know of any brothers. Though young Roger was no coward; and besides he was thoroughly aroused. In a fit of jealousy he sprang forward to expel the intruder. Roger's recollection of what followed was confused. He felt a stinging pain about his nose and then found himself rolling on the ground with his rival. When he found that he was getting the worst of the encounter, he was not long proclaiming his distress to the neighbors, while his antagonist, who was a coarse fellow, poured forth a stream of profanity that made the air tremble. Roger's family soon appeared on the scene and he was rescued and taken home, but in a sadly disfigured and painful condition.

His sad plight won some sympathy, but this second offense could not be winked at. The first thing to be done was to repair the damages to his personal appearance as far as possible; so he was hustled off to the bathroom. Roger, the romantic young lover, hero of a chivalrous encounter for the vindication of his love. But there are people in this world so benighted and blinded by selfishness and false ideas that the light of romance shines for them in vain.

Roger knew what was coming and barked—I mean remonstrated earnestly, but without avail. He was soon in the tub swallowing mouthfuls of nasty water and repenting his indiscretion in tears of soap suds. This adventure sobered him, however, and now his pugship is one of the most orderly members of the family. And Kittie—does he never think of her? "Ask of the winds."

The Raising of the Flag at Golden Springs

An Imitation

Bright and joyous was the day at Golden Springs when the new flag was first unfurled as freedom's glorious banner. In our new land submission and independence were contending for supremacy. Yet for the inhabitants of this little settlement far back in the mountains the flag was the symbol of lasting peace and happiness.

The first anniversary of Independence Day had come. Because of the joyous glow of patriotism in every breast all life seemed brighter. The roses breathed forth a sweeter fragrance, the oaks and pines and chestnuts reflected deeper greens, the sky was bluer, and the sun shone more dazzlingly.

And now, in the bright glow of the setting sun the new emblem was to be unfurled. Never had the old flag been so loved and honored as was now this new one. The tallest and shapeliest birch in the little village square had been chosen as the most befitting bearer of the dear emblem. The tree had been stripped of its boughs, then gayly decked by the village maidens with flowers and ribbons of the brightest colors. Flowers, too, were collected in great bunches or lay scattered in the grass, doing homage to the flag in silence and fragrance.

And see the festive gathering beneath the gayly adorned tree! All the village was there, clad in bright and glowing garb, ribbons and flowers decking youths and maidens all. Some, too, there were, who, more bent upon the festivity of the occasion than its patriotism, had chosen the time for masquerade. These were now mingling in the gathering. There was he of the savage Indian type; another wore the horns and skin of some wild animal and in this garb suggested freedom. The head and antlers of a stag decked one young man; and there was the bear's prototype in all but the hind legs, which showed a dazzling scarlet, in the long silk stockings. The real bear was there also, a living, moving creature, a tamed wild-animal of the forest, came to bestow his little tribute in dance and to take his oath of allegiance to the flag.

Had a traveler come upon these people suddenly from out of the darkness of the forest, he might have thought them some of the old world's bacchanalian revelers; but to a group of stern British soldiers, who looked on, unseen themselves among the trees, they were a band of unprincipled traitors.

Apart from the merry patriots and a little nearer the flag-pole stood two forms, more dignified and beautiful than were often seen in this sparsely settled land. One was a youth, clad in glistening apparel, with a sash of his country's colors draped upon his breast. By his right hand he held the rope of twisted birch-bark that would unfurl the flag at the top of the pole; and with the left hand he clasped the more slender one of a fair maiden, no less beautifully robed than he. Behind the couple and so closely hidden in the shadow of the flower decked pole that he was scarcely visible, stood the quiet yet joyful chaplain of the little group. He was dressed in clerical robes, which, however, lost their gloom in their decorations of bright flowers and brilliantly colored streamers. When he stepped out into the light, the man seemed, by the suppressed action in his body, and the sparkle of his eye, the most jovial of them all, and the natural leader of the group.

"People of the flag," cried the light-hearted chaplain, "joyfully, all the year, have your voices echoed the forest's cry of freedom. But let this be your happiest hour, for here, indeed, is joy! Before you stand the chosen of your village, whom, presently, I, as a servant of God, will join in holy matrimony. But first another office is theirs to fulfil for us. Now join you all in dance and song! Let the woods ring out merrily, full of wild glee and free as the forest, while the youth draws the birchen rope and unfurls for us our glorious emblem of freedom! Now sing, all ye that love the cause, and let the Stars and Stripes forever wave!"

Though the unfurling of the flag was only less serious than the marriage ceremony itself, yet song and dance, shout and jest, kept up merrily upon this doubly festive evening. The flag was unfurled midst a chorus, wild in glee and rich in patriotism. Then followed a few moments of quiet calm while the clergyman spoke the solemn words which made the youth and maiden man and wife. A few moments only of calm, then a young girl stepped forth, first scattering roses all about the pair; then, throwing a single laurel wreath over their heads, she prophesied thus their future life. The calm was broken, song and dance burst forth anew. "Let the forest ring!" called they. "Shout till the trees take up the echo and send it back again!"

The trees took up the echo and sent it back again, and the flag waved softly its approval; but the youth looking into his dear one's eyes was pained to see there a pensive sadness.

"Dorothy, my heart's dearest," whispered he, "are these roses, thorns, and is this laurel, rue, that you look so sad? Dear one, this is our time of joy. Cloud it not with any sorrows for it may be that nothing to come will be brighter than the remembrance of this hour."

"That was the very thought that made me sad. Why should we both think of it?" answered Dorothy, softly, that no tone of sadness might mar the mirth of others. "Something tells me, in my heart, my husband, that this happiness is but momentary. There is a vision, not yet quite plain, but I feel that the mystery will be solved."

Just then, as if the spell had cast its influence there, the flag twirled gently by the wind, caught on the birchen pole and remained half furled. It too, like the lovers, seemed to feel a gloomy presentiment and foretold the loss of freedom.

While the hour of sunset was passing, joy still reigned in hearts of the little band. Let us leave the group, now in their happiness, that we may discover who they were and why they had thus assembled.

Two hundred years ago, and more, a little group of colonists sailed from the Old World and landed in Pennsylvania on the banks of the Delaware. But because the king was just to his colonists, peace reigned not in the city founded by Penn. The little band pushed on into the forest where they hoped to live undisturbed. Arrested by the broad waters of the Susquehanna they stopped and built their homes. They named their little mountain village "Golden Springs."

When the band had met one day to decide upon a name for their settlement, one of the men, bringing a pail of water, had happily said, "The sun shines every morning and evening so regally on our little spring that it makes the water seem like pure gold. Let us call our village Golden Springs." The sentiment pleased the group and the village found its name.

Soon love for their new country imparted to the colonists a desire to know how it was faring in the contention with Britain and communication was established with the nearest city. Thus they learned of the Declaration of Independence and pledged themselves to its upholding. They were happy and merry in their far-away village, while the freedom they learned to love there was a freedom they wished for all. So now they had made their flag, to be unfurled on the anniversary of the birth of freedom; and the youth, chosen to wave widely the banner's folds, had prevailed upon the loved one of his heart to make the occasion doubly dear to him. The maid had consented and all the people rejoiced in their joy and worked merrily to make the day wholly festive. But the thought of freedom was not forgot. Patriotism ranged side by side with love.

As we glance once again at the birchen pole we see the flag still caught, yet struggling bravely to be free.

A last beam of the setting sun shines down upon it, making the red, the white and the blue each distinct in their turn and with gentle glow lingering long upon the little stars. The light grows dimmer, the shadows darken, until the stars and stripes are lost in the gathering gloom.

With the darkness came strange figures and intermingled with the group of merry makers. The company left unfinished its song, the revellers stood strangely calm. The Indian laid down his weapon and ceased the war-whoop which had sarcastically proclaimed his peacefulness; the stag raised his head to listen and prepare for fight; the bear caught up the Indian's weapon and stood ready in defense. In their midst stood the leader of the hostile intruders. Stern in aspect, energetic in movement, the whole man seemed made of iron, endowed with life, but without soul. He was the British commander, Burgoyne.

"Stand off, false subject!" cried he in threatening tone to the surprised leader of the village group. "I know thee Boyd, thou art the man who left thine own country and come hither to preach peace and prepare for war, a liar to your God and a traitor to your country. But first we shall see which flag shall wave. Let our standard be raised and woe unto him who disturbs it!"

With his strong arm Burgoyne grasped the rope which controlled the Stars and Stripes. But the rope obeyed not. Then the enraged man assaulted the birchen pole and rested not until the pole lay prostrate on the village square.

"Strip it of its silly gee-gaws and danglings, men of mine, but mind that you leave the flag for me to dispose of. By its fall it prophesied our victory. Independence is not yet. Now give me that striped muslin rag and I'll make an emblem of it."

But the flag was gone. There were stern hearts and true in that patriotic group. Death might be theirs, but not dishonor.

"I thought not to regret the cutting down of the pole," cried Burgoyne, when apprised of the loss of the flag, "but now I would it were made use of once more. I should like to have the prisoners dance around it to the tune of a thong until their flag shall be found. But bind the prisoners and bestow on them a few stripes to acquaint them of future justice."

"How many stripes for the clergyman?" inquired Joseph Stone, Burgoyne's aide.

"None as yet," replied the stern general, "until we decide what will atone for his misdeeds. Let him beware! A traitor's penalty is death!"

"And this dancing bear, grinning at us so insolently, what's to be done with him?" shouted another officer.

"Shoot him through the head and have done with the brute," came the order.

"Here stand a pretty pair," said Stone. "They seem to be receiving homage here. They need a double share of the spoils, eh, General?"

Burgoyne sheathed his sword and allowed himself to look upon the helpless couple. They stood there calm, self-collected, submissive. Apprehensive, yet fearless, in the first hour of their wedlock, they had learned to depend upon each other.

"Youth," said Burgoyne, "you show your happiness at the wrong time. Prepare to accept your share of adversity."

"Man," cried the youth, "are you stone? Will nothing move you? How I should like to fight you to the death, but the means is wanting. Under your imprisonment, powerless, here I beg, I implore! Do with me as you will, but touch not Dorothy, my wife."

"Is there any reason why the husband should suffer and the wife go free? What sayest thou woman?"

"Be it death and lay it all on me!"

Even this iron-hearted commander could not wholly conceal the softened heart which the girl's words enforced. "Trouble has come early upon these young lovers," he observed. "Have a care for them, and see how they comport themselves. The youth is comely and may make a brave soldier. He could teach us many things of this big country, and the maid may be of service, too. And you, young couple, think not that forest freedom brings a happier life than loyalty to the king."

The prisoners were gathered, gloom deepened upon the little village; sorrow was in the hearts of all. They went sadly to their homes to await their doom in the morning. But they knew that the flag was not destroyed and they foresaw freedom in the fate of the lovers whom they had but lately crowned with laurel. G. P. C.

Highway and Byway

My Lady of the Highway has jewels in her hair,
Miss Beauty of the Byway has only roses there;
But all the bright adorning in which the one's arrayed
Is duller than the morning within the other's braid.

O My Lady of the Highway,
What said he unto you?
O Miss Beauty of the Byway,
Will your dreams come true?
For Love he knows the byway
As well as any highway
When skies of youth are blue.

My Lady of the Highway has all that wealth can lend,
Miss Beauty of the Byway has what her God may send;
And yet it is a saying—My Lady, is it true?—
Young hearts will go a-Maying;—Miss Beauty, what say you?

O My Lady of the Highway,
I pray you have a care;
O Miss Beauty of the Byway,
I pray you now beware;
For Sorrow knows the highway
As well as any byway.
Since Love has led him there.

WAITMAN BARRE.

To a Certain One

The restlessness of unreturned desire;
The liveliness of longing unsurpassed;
The love, too strenuous ever to outlast
Continual evasion; all the fire;
And too impetuous passion; and the dire
Impatience that possessed me;—All is past.

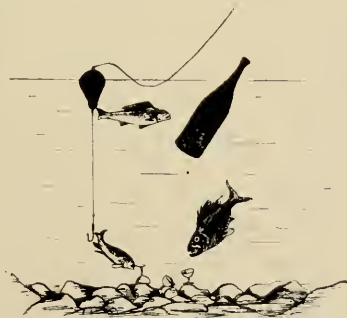

And now I feel that I shall drop it all,
This bitter task of struggling uselessly
Against your spirit of perversity,
For, with my helplessness, the very thrall
Of love—(of life itself!)—begins to pall
And utter weariness oppresses me.

I know what never man should care to know!
The sullen sorrow, and the blank despair
That filled the heart of that unhappy pair
Cast out of Eden, as they turned below
With emptiness before them, to and fro,
Hopeless and purposeless, to wander there.

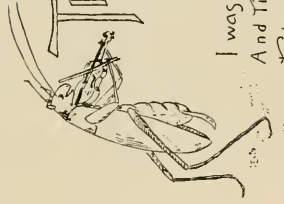

But should my love and this dejection move
Your heart to gentleness—with kind intent
To persecute no more—no longer bent
On ceaseless torture—then my heart would prove
The heights (As it has proved the depths!) of love
If only your unkindness would relent!

WEST VIRGINIA UNIVERSITY

WEST VIRGINIA UNIVERSITY is situated in the picturesque town of Morgantown on the banks of the beautiful Monongahela. This river affords exceptional facilities for boating and fishing. A few miles down the river is Point Marion, a very popular resort for students.

THE SONG OF THE CRICKET

Regrets
(On the Eve of Exams)

I was imprudent when the term was young
And time seemed plentiful and limitless,
To loathe the streets and circulate among
My fellow-worshippers of idleness.

Why did I recklessly consume that time
To tempt the fortune's with a chicken fight,

To gild a billiard table the last dime,

Or vex with mirth the drowsy ear of

What potent charm did tennis have or love,

And what attraction was there "over

What magic had the earth, or heaven above

To tempt me from my study room's retreat?

Why did I do it? I review the past

And count the worthlessness of all my fun

And estimate how infinitely vast

Are certain duties that were left undone,

While unavailing sighs and vain regret

Anticipate the flunkery's bitter pain.

(Nor Fate nor Fortune shall before me set

That cup of cursed idleness again!)

Now on the silence, unrelenting falls

The call for exams. There I hear my knell

And suffer more than those abandoned souls

That wing the horrid abysses of Hell.

A Confession

Perhaps those who do not know me will not care to read this account of my experience, because they will believe it to be untrue. Perhaps my friends will avoid it because they believe it to be true. However, I shall write it to relieve my mind. My brain seems weighed down with never-ending thoughts. The blood rushes boiling to my head; as quickly receding, freezing in my veins. Under such a strain either one's mind or body must give way. This cannot last long.

I was the only child of wealthy parents, consequently petted and spoiled. My worst fault was a violent temper. If any one interfered with me in any way I flew into a rage, and for the time was entirely unconscious of my actions.

At the age of sixteen I was sent to college, where I completed a regular classical course. Afterwards I was graduated in Medicine with high honors, in consequence of which I was rewarded with a fellowship. For a number of years afterwards I taught, first in one place and then in another. For the last ten years I have been Professor of Physiology and Anatomy in B—— College. I have been respected and honored by both faculty and students—for ten years—yes, until yesterday, I was loved.

For a number of years there has been in the basement of one of the buildings of the college a box of bones. Many times I had thought of putting them together. No one seemed to have much knowledge concerning them—they did not know even where they came from.

There was need of another human skeleton for demonstration in the class room; so I attempted, two nights ago, to mount these bones. Oh, if I had not touched them! Why did I not leave them to lie in the dust of years and mold forever?

Two short days ago I was happy. All the misdeeds—the crimes—yes, the crimes—had been laid away—pushed from my mind, and I was at peace with all the world. But now —. Ah, that terrible night! It is March; the wind blows fitfully. Against the brick building the full-leaved pine switches and the bare oak branches scrape stiffly. Now and then there is a dash of sleet and rain against the window.

I raise the skull to hang it on the hook in the frame I have arranged for it. What a small head it is! Surely the bones must have been those of a very small person. But, no—I lift the left femur—it is that of a man at least five feet ten inches tall. Slowly a painful memory creeps upon me.

The reconstruction continues. The little brass hooks and screws are fitted into their proper places. When I turn my eyes upward toward the skull I tremble and bury my face in my hands. But why should this skeleton affect me so? I have handled bones—human bones—for years, without the slightest thoughts of terror. The right hand has just been put in place and I arrange the bones of the left. All the bones are there excepting those of the index finger. Where are they? No—the box is empty now, they are not there. I slowly and hesitatingly raise the hand and fasten it to the wrist. Oh, that missing finger! I step back to survey my work. That small head! That empty space on the left hand! Slowly and piercingly they burn their impressions into my brain.

I turn to the window, raising it to let the night air cool my aching head. A gust of wind blows into the room. I hear the dry bones behind me rattle, and the sound is like a harsh chuckle. I wheel around, prepared to undo the work I have just completed. Horrors! the left hand of the thing before me is raised! The fingerless space points at me. Above it the little skull grins mockingly at me.

With sudden rage I step forward and catch the uplifted hand. How cold it feels! With nameless fear I begin to remove the hand. My knife slips and cuts—not bone but flesh. Oh, Heaven! the hand I hold is fast becoming covered with human flesh. I raise my eyes and look along the arm—the same cold hideous thing creeps like a wave toward the shoulder. I shrinkingly glance at the head. The wave of flesh has not yet reached it, but there in the orbital pits are two staring eyeballs, fixed and glassy. Oh, God! Then it is his skull; it is his maimed left hand!

I fall forward senseless, drawing the vile object with me to the floor.

For two days my mind has not been free from the haunting thoughts of that—that—What could describe it! But I shall not suffer this torment longer. I know not what may be my fate when the contents of this small vial are gone, but all the fiends of Hell have no terror for me now.

SARAH W. JOHNSON.

Knockers

"Resolved to Rule or Ruin"

Suppose some one who did not know should in these parts appear

And question as to knockers: We would answer—They are here!

We breed these nuisances (too mean to come beneath the law)

Within the narrow confines of the region of the Haw.
The atmosphere agrees with them and eke the climate, too,
But they, themselves, agree not with the Old Gold and Blue.

And, should you ask the reason, why then we would confess

That banner is not just the one to relish littleness.

And tho' our vales are narrow, as perhaps I hear you say,
'Tis better that our people should be much the other way.

Don't think they fail to signify because their souls are small.

The worst of knockers probably possess no souls at all.
And these have done their little best to woo us to our end,
They proved the thorns and stony ground with which we must contend.

We sowed—and efforts fruitless upon the wayside fell.
While others fell among the thorns and prospered far from well.

And others fell on stony ground—you know the Bible tale—

Because there was no depth of earth again our efforts fail.
And so, before our knocker's feet, he may throw pearls who cares—

The barrenness—the shallow soil—alike are theirs.

Over Cheat

Azure sky and emerald grass,
World in a golden haze—
Life worth the living,
Love worth the loving,
All on such summer days,
Oh, it was all deliciously sweet:
They were driving over Cheat.

Music throbs and the dancers sway,
But with an upward glance
She says: "I'm tired,
So very tired,
S'pose we sit out this dance."
So dreamy and soft, so cool, so sweet,
Are the moonbeams over Cheat.

Sweeter still on the homeward drive,
—Moonbeams, of course, I mean—
Life's worth the living,
Love's worth the loving,
All in a moonlit dream,
Where the roadside shadows sway and meet
As the dancers over Cheat.

Summer's gone, and the summer Maid—
Deserted the old-time ways;
Gone all the brightness,
Gone all the lightness,
Scattered that golden haze;

While chirps the cricket from lowly seat:
"O 'tis lonely over Cheat."

IRENE MILLER, '02.

Heart to Heart Talks with the Boys

No, Mr. Deignan, we do not think that all doctors are physicians.

WOODY: There have been no rules published on how to bet on chicken fights.

No, gentlemen, it is not customary, according to athletic etiquette, to withdraw your contribution, when one of your members fail to make first team.

WEENY: Give the dog a dash of French brandy, with a high-ball as a chaser.

KEY KLINE: Since you have refused your first offer, we do not know how you can get into a fraternity. The fraternity you desire will not accept you unless you can play ball.

TENNYSON: The pants you mention are made a la St. Clair. We can not tell you where to dispose of them. Sell them for bloomers. Or, why not cut a little out of the seat and make a coat and vest to match. But don't worry, for they are worn very much in the East (by the Turks).

BULLOCK: We can not tell you the best way to proceed to keep the Sophomore Class picture out of the Annual. We would refer you to Mr. Ballard.

MONROE O.: Yes, a cold bath in the morning is very invigorating. It is quite difficult, however, to acquire the habit of bathing when one is not used to it. It requires some courage to begin the custom.

STATTS: The question you ask, "Am I sane?" has so often been raised that we feel a delicacy in answering.

SENATOR HUGHES: Perhaps you are in love. The symptoms usually begin before any irregularity in diet is noticed. The light feeling in the head begins very early. A decrease in your invisible means of support necessarily follows. But do not be alarmed, for the case seems to be of long standing.

BERT: That numb sensation about the head will likely cause you to fear that you are threatened with enlargement of the brain, but do not be alarmed.

KOONIE: We are not well enough acquainted with the facts to inform you. Consult "Hoyle's How to Play Poker."

CHANG: Yes, the Lord said there was some good in everything, but remember this was before he saw the "Athenaeum."

West Virginia University

Readers of "The Monticola" who are not thoroughly acquainted with West Virginia University are invited to consider the following facts:

1. It has a faculty of nearly seventy members, educated in the best colleges and universities in the world.

2. It has students from every county in West Virginia and from many other States and countries.

3. It has ten buildings, eight of them of stone and brick; thoroughly modern laboratories, shops, libraries, etc.

4. It is just finishing one of the finest college library buildings in the country; its new Armory and Engineering buildings represent the best modern ideas.

5. Its new Athletic Field and its Gymnasium provide opportunities for all manner of sports.

6. Its Military Department, composed of 144 State Cadets under the charge of a United States Army Officer, is one of the important features.

7. Its School of Music has had phenomenal growth. There are six instructors in this School, and their work is of a very high order.

8. Its Department of Fine Arts is rapidly growing in popularity and efficiency.

9. Every graduate of its College of Engineering holds a good position. Its engineers are in great demand. Its College of Engineering is one of the strongest and most practical to be found.

10. Its College of Law has nearly one hundred students, and has trained practically all of the leading young lawyers in West Virginia, and great numbers in other States.

11. Its College of Agriculture offers the most useful courses, including instruction in Veterinary Science.

12. Its Preparatory School fits young men and women to enter any of the colleges or schools of the University.

McCall's Clerk's Assistant

SIXTH EDITION, REVISED, LARGELY REWRITTEN, AND BROUGHT DOWN TO DATE BY

H. B. BRADBURY, OF THE NEW YORK BAR

ABOUT 1265 pp., PRICE, $6.00 NET

This well-known work has been greatly enlarged and now contains a complete list of forms of general utility throughout the United States. Such subjects as conveyances and acknowledgments have been exhaustively treated, and the work contains not only statutory forms of deeds, mortgages and acknowledgments, but also all necessary information as to what officers are qualified to take acknowledgments, according to the laws of the various States, requirements as to seals, the necessity of a husband joining in making conveyances, the provisions as to dower, and the statutory requirements for the authentication of the signature, etc., of the officers taking the acknowledgment, according to the laws of all the States.

The forms of corporate mortgages have been made complete, including those adapted to manufacturing as well as to railroad corporations.

Such general subjects as contracts, powers of attorney, wills, receipts, bankruptcy, landlord and tenant, letters of credit, pensions, patents, etc., etc., have received careful and exhaustive attention.

The list of corporation forms, including membership as well as stock, is as complete as those contained in many special works on the subject.

The provisions of the United States Stamp Tax as amended in 1901, are concisely and correctly stated.

In addition to the forms are many pages of explanatory matter and notes of cases relating to the subjects as to which forms are given. A new and complete index supplemented by a list of forms at the beginning of each chapter, renders easy the work of the searcher for any particular form.

There is no book on the market at the present time that covers so large a field as this. It is indispensable to attorneys, public officers and clerks, and is the best work at present published for general use throughout the country.
